“ Charmain’s Umbrella

In my dream, we’re standing in the cold rain, and Charmain is motioning for us to join her under a big umbrella.

She’s smiling in a white dress, as we walk along a flagstone path. She’s speaking proudly of seven beautiful sons, ten healthy grandchildren, all they’ve accomplished, all they will, and how much she misses them.

I’m shocked when I notice hundreds of us under that umbrella—an umbrella as big as a circus tent! Someone finally rescues me, saying, “Child, didn’t you know that umbrella’s just Char’s aura?”

Walking on, we never seem to make progress toward a big, yellow house.

There’s a telling of story upon story of gratitude, soulful thanks; expressions of Charmain’s warmth and generosity caring for the poor, the young, the sick.

Finally, approaching the big yellow house, the rain suddenly stops, the clouds part, with the sweet sound of gospel music emanating. Char leads us all in a wonderful refrain, her lovely voice rising in golden light, the last vestiges of the day.

At the door, we’re greeted to what, at first, looks like a Thanksgiving scene, but it’s just a regular Sunday at the McFadden’s, with everybody sitting down to enjoy Charmain’s famous mac and cheese.

Charmain passes the threshold as if the pandemic never happened, folding her umbrella at the door.

I never knew there were magic umbrellas, or, earth angels, before...
